Pain, which would seem to count among the most basic emotions, does not form part, however, of the Aristotelian catalogue of páthe according to Book II of Rhetoric. The aim of this article is to analyse the reasons for such absence and to approach the funeral ritual through the vocabulary of pain as it is unfolded in the kommós of the euripidean tragedy Trojan Women (vv. 1287-1332), in order to calibrate its presence in the patterns of this ritual.
